The only difference between a traditional warehouse and a solar-powered warehouse is how the facility gets electricity. The electric grid supplies power to a traditional warehouse, but a solar-powered warehouse usually has both solar and grid-connected electrical systems in place. The solar helps offset or, in some cases, completely replace the energy drawn from the grid.

hydrogen solar panels That doesn't really exist, you can produce/extract hydrogen with electricity and use it as chemical battery, simpler to pump water up to an elevated water tank and then release into a micro-hydro power generator, or what I'm going to do that is to use excess power to heat water when batteries are mostly charged.
